To whom it may concern,

I am writing this letter on behalf of Connor Robison. I have had the pleasure of knowing Connor for approximately 6 years. During most of this time I was his coach. Upon meeting Connor, during a tryout, I was immediately impressed with his intense dedication and competitive spirit. Connor is a passionate person who always went above and beyond anything I could ask of him.

A perfect example of this was his willingness to play through extreme pain. Connor was diagnosed with a condition where he went through extreme growth spurts. When this occurred he developed micro-fractures, primarily in his shins. Doctors advised, the risks of complications were minimal and he could play baseball as long as he could tolerate the pain. Only on the rarest occasions would Connor ever succumb to the obvious pain. He would play through the pain with the same intensity he was known for.

Connor's passion and intensity is also seen in his strong internal values. He is a caring, ethical person who supports his family and friends. Connor is the type of person who gives everything he has all the time to his family, friends, and teammates. This may seem like a cliché but Connor has always given everything he has no matter what the circumstances. Whether the game was extremely lopsided or we were simply practicing he always gave 110%.

Since meeting Connor I have known him to be a great friend, family member, and teammate.

Regards,
